"A Traveling Companion on Your Life Journey"

In Grief, Name What You Need by Pastor Julie Wrubbel-Lange

I was in seminary when I received a phone call from "back home" that my maternal grandmother had died. My mother and aunt made the funeral arrangements and a couple of days later I found myself on an Amtrak train returning to Wisconsin for the funeral.

Many years later I can honestly admit I don't remember much about the funeral, the visitation that had preceded it, nor the burial and lunch that followed. What I do remember from that cold January day was the return with my aunt and mother to my grandmother's room in our family's home where she had lived with me, my siblings and parents for eighteen wonderful years.

For some reason, my aunt wanted to sort through my grandmother's meager belongings just a few hours after we had said our final goodbyes. I remember watching as she and my mother divided up some gold coins and jewelry. My aunt and mother's behavior were in absolute contrast to what I wanted to do. I wanted to sit quietly and alone in my grandmother's room, finger through the clothes that hung in her closet, and yes I will admit it, even attempt to smell her distinctive scent as I wrapped myself in one of her old sweaters. I wanted time! I wanted inactivity! I wanted to stop, rest and reflect not clear away her possessions!

Upon further consideration I began to understand that neither my response nor my family members' responses to my grandmother's death were "wrong". I believe my aunt and mother needed to be busy as much as I needed to stop and rest. This personal experience has had a significant impact on my understanding of grief as I have ministered to hundreds of grieving families over the past years.

A simple but easily forgotten truth is that each of us grieves in our own distinct way. It is easy during the emotional turmoil of grief, in the middle of our own fatigue and sadness to judge the words or actions of others as uncaring or cruel. We may have a desire to talk about our grief while our closest family member appears remote or withdrawn. We may need to begin the disposition of our loved one's possessions while other family members may need to wait.

I am repeatedly reminded that not only do individuals grieve differently, but that people also can have very different ways of understanding God's presence in the midst of their grief.

One of the things we can do as grieving people is to name what we need. It assists those around us. If being busy is helping you in your grief journey, say it out loud. Likewise, if silent walks and time alone is what you need, then say it.

If upcoming familiar activities like family picnics or holiday celebrations seem overwhelming it is alright to say, "I'm not up to participating right now." And then be aware that the insistent desire of a friend to attend the event even after you've declined isn't necessarily meant to be impatient or mean-spirited. Rather, it may simply be a friend's inability to understand your unique way of grieving.

And if what you need to do with your grief is "talk it out" and those closest to you are unavailable, there are other places to turn. Many congregations and other organizations offer "grief groups". These gatherings provide people with an opportunity to share their stories with others who are walking a similar path. Remember that just as individuals differ so does the organization and structure of grief groups. Some groups include an educational component. Others are devoted entirely to mutual sharing and support. Some grief groups meet monthly, others seasonally.

In the grief groups that I have facilitated, I am repeatedly reminded that not only do individuals grieve differently, but that people also can have very different ways of understanding God's presence in the midst of their grief. Some individuals speak of feeling abandoned, wondering "where is God"? Other people speak of seeing God all around them - in the comfort they have received from neighbors, church members or friends who arrive unannounced with a hot meal or who send a thoughtful note.

Estate Planning: Part 3

Will Substitutes and Trusts

by Attorney Philip R. Brehm

The pages of TOMORROW™ are designed to help our readers travel their grief journey, secure in the knowledge that they are not alone. To that end, we hope the following article--Part 2 of a 4 part series--sheds valuable light on this sometime misunderstood aspect of estate planning. This is only intended as general information and you should contact your legal and tax representative for advice based on your specific fact situation.

Joint Tenancy and Life Insurance

If the only assets to be transferred are jointly owned property, individually owned life insurance or survivorship marital property (property to which either spouse has the right to full ownership upon the death of the other), they can be called will substitutes. Most jointly owned property and survivorship marital property are transferred to the survivor with a minimum amount of paperwork. Insurance policies pay proceeds to the beneficiaries that were chosen prior to death.

Before you decide you don't need a will, remember that you may want to name alternate heirs in case you and the joint owner (often a spouse) die at the same time. You also should consider naming a guardian for your minor children, and you may be able to leave your heirs a larger estate by using a will with specific provisions to save on taxes.

Testamentary Trust

A trust is an arrangement in which one party holds property for the benefit of another. You may use your will to create a trust upon your death (a testamentary trust). Such trusts often are used to provide income for spouses or to hold property until minor children become adults. The trustee, which holds the property, often is a bank or trust company. The trustee is responsible for investing and protecting the property, paying out the income earned and terminating the trust as the will directs. A trust can help protect young beneficiaries from making unwise investment decisions or wasteful spending.

Living Trusts

A living (inter vivos) trust can be used to control your property during your lifetime. Its terms may allow the trust to continue to control the property after your death. You would need to sign documents transferring your property to the trust. For tax purposes, during your lifetime that property is generally treated the same as if you still owned it.

A living trust can have some advantages and some disadvantages. On the positive side, property held in the trust may not be subject to probate procedures. On the other hand, buying, handling and selling assets may be more cumbersome. You should consult an attorney to understand the effect of a living trust on your property. ❖

As a Christian pastor, I understand those who feel abandoned (just read the book of Lamentations or recall Jesus' words from the cross in the Gospel of Matthew, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?") I can also affirm those who readily see God's presence in the midst of their darkest hours. In giving voice to grief, (including doubts and anger) healing begins. ❖

When

by Deb Kosmer

*When I am feeling sad and lonely, help me remember your smile
and the sound of your laughter.*

*When I am discouraged and wonder why I am still here, let the phone or door bell ring
and a friend be there.*

*When I dread waking up in the morning,
let there be sunshine to warm my soul.*

*When I fell angry and confused by the unfairness of life,
let me remember all of the good times
that we had.*

*When I want so badly to have you here,
make yourself known to me in a way I'll understand.*

Reassure me that life continues and that this separation will not be forever.

*When time passes...
help me move forward into life
knowing your presence is with me.
Help me to know that there are no boundaries to LOVE...and, no end. ❖*

Beyond Sorrow

Christian Reflections on Death and Grief

by Herb & Mary Montgomery • Review by Joan Faltynski

Death frequently deals a paralyzing blow to our typical independent nature. In a matter of minutes our sense of self-confidence and our decision-making ability begin to be questioned during the grief process. We feel something similar to an imagined amputation.

In the best of times, when all of life's challenges call forth the best of our giftedness, we are energized to respond wholeheartedly. There is never a challenge that, with the help of God, we feel incapable of handling. More often than not, we probably have to admit that the bulk of our accomplishments are attributed to our own doing rather than to a partnered dependence on God.

Now, when we feel weak and vulnerable, having a Higher Power to lean on is both comforting and welcomed. Herb and Mary Montgomery, in Beyond Sorrow, provide seventeen single-page reflections that give credence to the pain we are experiencing in the early stages of grief; faith-filled support during the duration of the journey; and hope for the day when some sign of wholeness and normalcy returns to our life.

Faith-based perspectives are offered in these reflections to the following questions that are typically raised during the grieving process.

- Why did it have to happen?*
- Is there no end to crying?*
- Where do I turn?*
- Where are my friends?*
- Will I always feel guilty?*
- How long will I drift?*
- What will tomorrow bring?*
- Is it worth picking up the pieces?*

In the words of E.B. Pusey, "God does not take away trials or carry us over them, but rather strengthens us through them." ❖

Joan Faltynski, a life long elementary and middle school teacher, reviews books and videos for Proko-Wall.

Salmon with Lemon & Dill

- 6 oz. salmon filet
- 1 Tbsp. melted butter
- 1 Tbsp. lemon juice
- 3/4 teaspoon dried dill weed
- 1/8 teaspoon garlic powder
- Sea salt to taste
- Black pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 350 degrees. Lightly grease a small baking dish.

Place salmon in baking dish. Mix the butter and lemon juice in a small bowl and drizzle over the salmon. Season with dill, garlic powder, sea salt and pepper.

Bake 20 minutes in the preheated oven or until salmon is easily flaked with a fork.

Serve with parsley potatoes and a salad. ❖
